During the Old English era (circa 450-1150 AD), texts like "Beowulf" utilized a Germanic-based language filled with compound words and alliteration. The transition to Middle English (1150-1500 AD), exemplified by Geoffrey Chaucer's "The Canterbury Tales," introduced French and Latin influences due to the Norman Conquest, enriching the lexicon and altering syntax. Early Modern English, the language of Shakespeare and the King James Bible (1500-1700 AD), witnessed the standardization of spelling and grammar, alongside expansive lexical creativity.

For example, the Renaissance period catalyzed a revival of classical learning and humanism, which is evident in the elevated rhetorical style of Shakespeare and Marlowe. The Victorian era, marked by industrialization and empire expansion, brought a didactic tone and moral earnestness to literature, with authors like Charles Dickens employing detailed, descriptive language to critique social issues.
